A rare complication of lower cervical spine discectomy: Anterior spinal canal stenosis with syringomyelia. Symptomatic cervical spondylosis can result in spinal cord compression and neurological deficits. We present a case of syringomyelia presenting as a complication after cervical discectomy in which the syrinx was presumed to have developed at the lumbar level. After an uneventful recovery, the patient presented with a period of slow progression of neurological deficits. An MRI at that time revealed a hyperintense syrinx extending from the C4 to C7 levels consistent with the symptoms. There was no intradural or extraspinal extension of the syrinx. The patient underwent cervical discectomy with posterior exposure from C4 to C7. Intraoperatively, the syrinx was found to have compressed the spinal cord. A small dural defect was repaired using primarily closed techniques with no further complications. At 6-month follow-up, the patient reported improvement in his neurological status, and a repeat MRI confirmed resolution of the syrinx. Syringomyelia is rarely a sequelae of cervical spine conditions. Our case represents the first report of an isolated syringomyelia developing due to a dural tear secondary to a cervical spine surgery. This report serves to raise awareness of these benign lesions being extraaxial, and it points to the importance of a thorough and competent preoperative neurological examination of the cervical spine.
